For Scheler, the term "man" must not be used to name the special characters possessed by men as a and mammals. It seems clear that the concept of sub-group vertebrates man must be "loaded" from the outset, so that man is irreducible to the nature. According to the traditional conception, the concept of man as the idea of God as a central point of reference. The image of God presupposes This concept of man ...

Max Scheler - Wikipedia

The practical significance of Scheler's Stratification of Emotional Life is obvious in several respects and points of view. First, Scheler seems to be making a case in favor of what we might refer to today as Emotional Intelligence, as a portal to more ethical behavior and optimum personal development, similar to the ancient Greek concern for promoting virtuous character.

The Human Place in the Cosmos | Northwestern University Press

Outside The Cosmos Titled "The Human Place in the Cosmos", Max Scheler's book finds that the human place is largely outside the Cosmos. Scheler (1874 -- 1928), was a German philosopher who studied with Dilthey and Simmel. His own pupils included Edith Stein, and he deeply influenced other thinkers including Merleau-Ponty and Pope John Paul II.
